Dissertation

My dissertation explores the role that both political and non-political media play in shaping out-group attitudes among the American public. More specifically, I argue that media influences how we think about out-groups in two ways. First, through classical conditioning, passive and active exposure to media portrayals of groups help mold who we perceive the prototypical member of groups to be, shaping subsequent beliefs about and attitudes toward the group. Second, media informs us about what others who share our in-group identities, whether other citizens or in-group elites, think about the groups in question. These cues are both informational and normative—shaping both the content of our attitudes but also setting the boundaries of what is acceptable to think. I argue that these media effects are conditioned by our everyday experiences with member of these groups. Media effects are stronger in insular communities, where first-person contact with members of out-groups is rare or non-existent, than in environments where intergroup contact is frequent.
